

Working With Black Young People

Edited by Momodou Sallah and Carlton Howson

Bringing together different dimensions and perspectives on such work, this book seeks to challenge both the accepted status quo of Black young people's negative over representation in most aspects of life - including education, criminal justice, housing and health - and their under-representation in empiric literature. It seeks to help find ways forward.

Contributions from a wide range of practitioners, academics, and students all draw on personal experiences and explore a wide range of important issues. Offering opportunities to gain a deeper insight into issues that confront Black young people – and consider strategies for change – the chapters in this book are sometimes about specific sections of the community but often, and collectively, about the lives of many different people with shared experiences of oppression, immigration history and discrimination.
